

UW primate research is scientifically meaningless, because it is performed on primates that are so psychologically abnormal that their levels of stress would severely alter their physiology. The only truly meaningful way to study primates is in their natural environment.

INFANT ABUSE

Stuck in the archaic, barbaric experiments of the 1950's, UW researchers are still tearing infant monkeys away from their mothers to intentionally cause psychological trauma, and watch the harm that results. Newborns are grabbed with leather gloves, numbered, tattooed, and isolated in an incubator, to spend their first night terrified and alone. This is devastating to both babies and their mothers through-out their lives, causing psychosis and self mutilation.

VISION EXPERIMENTS

Albert Fuchs began eye position experiments in 1964. In 2008, when the UW was fined for 41 unauthorized eye surgeries on 14 monkeys. Fuchs refused to hand over one monkey's head. "Vision researchers" implant coils on the monkeys' eyeballs, thread wires up the skull and put metal cylinders into holes drilled in the monkey's skull. Currently, Michael Mustari is surgically altering infant macaques to have misaligned eyes, impaired eye movements, and inability to hold a gaze.

BRAIN EXPERIMENTS

Highly sensitive, intelligent, socially-complex Macaque monkeys have holes drilled into their skulls, metal restraint devices screwed into their heads, and electrodes inserted into their brains. Some have portions of their brains destroyed to impair their cognitive function or cripple them. They are immobilized in restraint chairs and deprived of water until they perform tasks. After the experiment most primates are killed, and their brains removed and dissected.

VACCINE TESTS

Rhesus Macaques are given infectious diseases, sometimes in the womb, to test experimental vaccines. They suffer acute weight loss, major organ failure, breathing problems, and neurological disorders before they die excruciatingly painful deaths or are killed. Their short, isolated existence in tiny, barren cages, denying them everything natural, causes most Macaques to succumb to spinning endlessly and self-mutilation, in a tragic attempt to cope with the desolation that they experience.

